40 YEARS, 100 CLASSES

OF NATIONAL PARK SERVICE- Seasonal Law Enforcement Training

First, they learned how to stand in formation and snap to a proper salute.

Later, they learned how to draw a weapon and hit a target from various distances.

Hundreds of hours were spent in the classrooms at SCC's Public Safety Training Center.

Hundreds more went into all manner of hands-on training – ranging from interrogation techniques, conducting sobriety tests, controlling a skid car, accident investigations and patrol skills.

There were long runs and the agony of experiencing pepper spray and a taser shock.

But there was also euphoria of hitting the bulls-eye and the fulfillment of surviving a grueling regimen that's earned a glowing reputation for Southwestern Community College's nationally respected program.

Along the way, recruits in the 100th class of SCC's National Park Service-Seasonal Law Enforcement Training learned all the skills they'll need to successfully protect the parks that are scattered across the United States and its territories.

Congratulations and best wishes to everyone who's been a part of Southwestern's NPS-SLET Class No. 100.

Now comes the big question: Who's ready to be part of Class No. 101?

Kirby raises $2,100 for Student Emergency Fund

Running (and occasionally walking) 74 miles in one day allows a man plenty of time to think.

Matt Kirby, who serves as the Jackson County Early College Liaison, spent much of his time on the Georgia Death Race considering the bigger picture of why he was pushing his body to the brink of exhaustion on March 31.

Anytime his legs started aching or his lungs began to burn or his throat got parched, Kirby would scroll through his mind and see the faces of the Southwestern Community College students who may benefit from his efforts.

Along the way, he trimmed three hours off his time from the year before. Out of more than 280 competitors who started the race, Kirby was among the 130 who finished.

"If I had to run 74 miles by myself with no support, no aid station, nobody handing me water or encouragement, it would be miserable, and I would probably fail," Kirby said. "The fact that there are all these people out there who don't even really know you, but you're connected by this trail, and they're rooting for you, cheering you on and supporting you in all these different ways – it's a metaphor for how life is when things get hard."

That's also an accurate metaphor for what Kirby was doing on that trail – and what he does every day in supporting JCEC students at SCC.

Kirby raised $2,100 in donations through his participation in the Georgia Death Race, and he gave every penny to the SCC Foundation's Student Emergency Fund. The fund assists students with crisis-type emergencies that might otherwise prevent them from continuing toward their college degrees.

SCC AND MOTHER TOWN JOIN FORCES TO BENEFIT LOCAL TRIBAL MEMBERS

"I was in a rut with addiction the past few years, really from the time I was a teenager," said Lambert, who is 27. "Life was going nowhere, and I didn't really have any connections to get anywhere in life ... I finally decided to get into recovery and turn things around."

By: Avery Minnick

In recent months, Southwestern Community College's Educational Opportunities department has partnered with the Mother Town Healing Project through the Tribal Employment Rights Office (TERO) of the Qualla Boundary to provide employability skills training, career opportunities and additional support to tribal members recovering from addiction.

The Mother Town Healing Project is a TERO initiative aiming to provide recovery support, personal growth, skill-building opportunities and community to those in need. These efforts are centered around giving a second chance to tribal members recovering from addiction.

TERO partnered with SCC's Human Resources Development program to provide workforce preparation classes that include numerous activities and chances for professional development.

All 10 students in the inaugural class are Cherokee residents who eagerly participated in all aspects of the program overseen by Deborah Kennedy, adjunct instructor for Educational Opportunities at SCC and Erin Taylor of the TERO office.

Most recently, students took part in the "New Year, New Me" program, during which each received a professional makeover at SCC's Jackson Campus. Each Mother Town participant picked out some clothing from SCC's professional clothes closet, and SCC cosmetology students gave the Mother Town participants new hairstyles.

"These students mean so much to me, just to see the growth and genuine love they have for each other," Kennedy said. "The fact that we are integrating the two programs so seamlessly is incredible."

A star student within the Mother Town Healing Project has been Jake Lambert, who expressed gratefulness for an opportunity for employment. He also appreciated that the program has allowed him to get back on his feet and make a better plan for his future.

"I was in a rut with addiction the past few years, really from the time I was a teenager," said Lambert, who is 27. "Life was going nowhere, and I didn't really have any connections to get anywhere in life ... I finally decided to get into recovery and turn things around. Through recovery is where I heard about Mother Town."

"(Mother Town Instructors and organizers) have been flexible with me and let me attend the groups I go to for recovery," Lambert added. "They helped me get my driver's license back. They helped me with studying and took me to the Department of Motor Vehicles. They helped me apply for jobs outside the program. They helped with the little things that help you get back on your feet."

When asked if he could give a struggling individual advice Lambert said: "Be committed. If it is something you seriously want, be committed, set your goals and go out and achieve them."

This pilot group has seen major success. All 10 students received internship placements to gain work experience, and many are working to gain full-time positions.

SCC offers participants a no-cost employability lab, which teaches necessary skills to apply for jobs online, successfully interview and maintain employment. Similar labs are offered to the general public at locations in Jackson, Macon, Swain Counties and the Qualla Boundary.

Bianca Dardeen said Mother Town has given her "confidence, employability skills and a better understanding of how her surrounding community is loving and forgiving."

Dardeen spoke most positively, however, about the friendships she has made through the program.

SCC and the Mother Town Healing Project are opening new doors for those in need, and - through this program - the students are showing the community that anything is possible with hard work.
