The fight against the CORONAVIRUS PANDEMIC

“I use my technical skills from the MLT program at SCC in all of my daily work, and they are the basis for the development and growth I’ve had in my career as a medical technologist, operations manager and now a director. The program gave me the skills to do all kinds of testing, and it also gave me a foundation for thinking about how laboratories help in the bigger picture of healthcare, like the COVID-19 pandemic happening right now.”

WENDY WILLIAMS

Wendy Williams, a 2005 graduate from Southwestern Community College’s Medical Laboratory Technology program, is now facing the Coronavirus pandemic head on as the Director of Laboratory and Pathology Services for the Appalachian Regional Healthcare System (ARHS) in Boone.

A confirmed case of Coronavirus (COVID-19) this spring in Watauga County was one of the state’s first west of Raleigh. It led Western North Carolina public officials and health administrators to prepare for the pandemic to officially impact this region.

According to Williams, her organization quickly started its emergency operations/incident command protocol, assisting with the setup of off-site collection centers in Avery and Watauga Counties to serve outpatients for testing. They also began aiding local physicians offices, emergency departments and urgent care facilities with sample collection and processing.

“Right now, I believe the goal of all healthcare organizations is to work toward being able to manage patients outside of emergency departments and other medical offices,” Williams said in March. “We want to prevent our regional hospitals from being overwhelmed by the potential influx of cases, and we’re working diligently to ensure that doesn’t happen.”

Williams also reported that healthcare professionals are following CDC guidelines to prevent infection for themselves. This includes wearing gloves, gowns, eye protection and N95 health grade masks.

Through the pandemic, Williams credits her education at SCC with providing her many of the skills she is using in her position today.

“At SCC, we really try to emphasize the hands-on learning from day one. We demand a lot from our students in this program, but hopefully it pays off in critical times like these.”

ANDREA KENNEDY

“I use my technical skills from the MLT program at SCC in all of my daily work, and they are the basis for the development and growth I’ve had in my career as a medical technologist, operations manager and now a director,” says Williams. “The program gave me the skills to do all kinds of testing, and it also gave me a foundation for thinking about how laboratories help in the bigger picture of healthcare, like the COVID-19 pandemic happening right now.”

“The MLT program coordinator, Andrea Kennedy, was instrumental in helping me learn all the skills I needed. She always made sure I was successful in my education,” Williams added. “We’ve stayed in touch since I graduated, and have successfully worked to train multiple people from phlebotomists to MLTs using SCC’s online program and in-person labs within the Appalachian Regional Healthcare System.”

Kennedy offered similar praise to Williams, recognizing her as a standout student from the program.

“Wendy was an excellent student here, and I’m not surprised at all that she’s making her mark on the world,” Kennedy said. “At SCC, we really try to emphasize the hands-on learning from day one. We demand a lot from our students in this program, but hopefully it pays off in critical times like these.”

While developments in the Coronavirus pandemic are ongoing and change daily, Williams echoes the CDC in emphasizing the importance of hygiene and sanitation, social distancing and being proactive if you think you may be ill, coronavirus or otherwise.

New Century Scholars

BACKGROUND

Founded in 1995 by Dr. Charles McConnell (Superintendent of Jackson County Public Schools at the time) and Dr. Barry Russell (SCC President at the time).

GOAL

Help deserving, qualified students from Jackson, Macon and Swain Counties obtain their college education without worrying about the expense.

THANK YOU

More than 2,400 lives changed since 1995. None of this would be possible without the generosity of our communities.

NCS, MEET THE GOVERNOR

FIRST CLASS OF NCS

HOW NEW CENTURY SCHOLARS MAKES A DIFFERENCE

"The financial part was awesome. It obviously took a lot of the burden away from parents, families and even us as students. But the mentorship you received from the leaders who were working with you was more of a help than any other part of it, in learning how to interview and deal with other people."

A DIGITAL WORKFORCE

After urging from the Centers for Disease Control, President Donald Trump and other leading officials, millions of Americans have begun social distancing to prevent the spread of Coronavirus (COVID-19).

For many, that includes teleworking: completing a full day's work in front of their home computers, sending and receiving instant messages and holding video conferences with colleagues while spouses, children and pets linger in the background.

With teleworking becoming the new norm for the foreseeable future, businesses and employees face both new challenges and opportunities. The true impact of a digital workforce on the economy is still unknown, but instructors from Southwestern Community College's information technology and computer science fields anticipate major changes.

"I think that companies will likely see a decrease in their utility bills and their absenteeism. At the same time, they will see an increase in the quantity and quality of work and the morale of their employees," said Dawn Harrison, Computer Information Technology Instructor at Southwestern Community College. "The employee is likely to feel more empowered and enjoy the flexibility offered by teleworking. It's a win-win for both. I believe that many companies will continue with teleworking, even after the pandemic is over."

Scott Cline, Information Technology Programs Chair at SCC, added that although households may feel hectic right now with almost all other industries physically closed (such as public schools), teleworking in general is a positive experience.

"We're already seeing this transition in larger cities where companies have employees working from home all over the world, and I think that we will see more and more companies making the transition to teleworking once they see how well it works," said Cline. "For example, it often takes employees 30 minutes to an hour one-way to get to work. This allows employees to cut travel time out, giving them more time at home to spend with their families, friends or pursue recreational activities, which makes them much happier."

Following the current economic shift, Harrison and Cline expect a huge surge in digital related jobs, especially information technology.

"IT professionals are the life-line for companies that are mandating teleworking. They are the ones who are setting up the networks, securing the networks, training employees and providing much-needed support throughout the company," said Harrison. "IT permeates every industry, from agriculture to entertainment to law, with both major companies and local companies having some sort of digital presence and requiring network professionals. Prior to COVID-19 and this huge economic shift, IT was expected to grow 12% between 2018 and 2028. Now, we're going to see those numbers climb even higher."

SCC currently offers four information technology degrees and four certificate options, all from different areas of IT such as software and web development, support and services, network management and cyber crime technology. These programs are all offered fully online, and many students work full-time and have family at home.

For more information on any of the information technology programs at SCC, please contact Cline at 828.339.4494 or scline@southwesterncc.edu.
